"Its great that you've all ready started but its also a good thing to take your time and think first", said Anne Dujon the art teacher. "Most painters prefer thinking and planning for awile rather then diving rite in. Now, I've brought these paints for you to use that have warmer tones. This painting of the apples for example is more warmer than the seashells. Some people think that I make my students create cold gray paintings but that ain't true. I know that you can paint good, and I know you like to paint with warm colors. You have a interéesting start but now you need to take a brake to think about what youre doing and how you feel about it".

In a Day's Work

The five men sat around the circular table, silent, it was Eric who spoke 1st. "Whose going to report these findings to the President"? he asked. No one answered. Someone tapped their pencil on the desk.

"Lamar and me both agree that this can't wait until tomorrow", Eric continued. "Ira, its youre responsibility as chair of this committee to take action." Eric's eyes fixed on Ira, whose seemed to be studying a spot on the floor. "Alright. If you wont, then either Tom or Tyrone is going to present their case this afternoon."

Before either one could object Ira stood up. "I can't take this anymore. For crying out loud I'll tell president Norm that know one nose where the coffee machine is!"
